

ABSTRACT

A data communications link uses a multi-power level optical source to encode and transmit data words along a communications channel to a receiver station. A received signal condition monitor senses the level of a pre-determined characteristic and transmits a control signal to a controller which controls the power output of the optical source.